

CONTRIBUTORS

James Golen, The University of Alabama: is pursuing majors in history, economics, and mathematics. He is originally from Elmhurst, Illinois. He also works as a research assistant on the CARE International project at the Wilson Center's Cold War Archive Research Institute. His historical interests center primarily around the cold war, and early Soviet history in particular. James plans on completing his undergraduate studies abroad at St. Catherine's College in Oxford before going on to obtain a PhD in economics.

David Brostoff, American University in Washington D.C.: studies international relations and is a Lincoln Scholar in political theory. David is most interested in classical realism, and particularly in Hans Morgenthau's tragic vision of politics. He is also interested in both strategy and grand strategy. Hailing from Deerfield, Illinois, David aspires to eventually establish a career working on policy planning and strategy at a think tank or with the U.S. government.

Jack Miller, Roanoke College: recently graduated with majors in history and English and a minor in anthropology. His research interests include historiography, food history, pre and ancient history, and pre-contact American history. Following graduation he hopes to continue working in historic circles both in and outside of the university.

Lainey Decker, The University of Alabama: a current junior majoring in History with a minor in English literature. She is interested in contemporary American history. Lainey intends to apply for law school in her senior year.

Elliot Sheehan, Appalachian State University: is currently pursuing a Bachelors of Science Degree in history, social studies education with a minor in French. Elliot is fascinated by American transportation and infrastructure history, especially the Interstate Highway System and the historical attempts to conquer nature. He hopes to enroll in a history Masters program upon graduation and eventually teach high school social studies.

David Washington Moore, The University of Alabama: is a senior from Hartselle, Alabama majoring in History with a double minor in the Blount Scholars Program and English. Their research and field experience primarily focuses on the intersection of History, Archival Studies, and the Digital Humanities. Washington's historical interests include Jewish participation in trade throughout medieval and early modern Europe, slavery and Reconstruction in the American South, and Digital History. After their Spring 2024 graduation, they plan to move to Philadelphia and continue working to make history accessible and amplify the underrepresented histories of marginalized communities in museums, libraries, and archival facilities.